Not illustrated.1857 Excerpt: ... THIRD SKETCH. REFORMATION AND REVOLUTION. Luther's residence at the Wartburg is the conclusion of the first great period of his labour, during which his mind first conceived the principle of the Reformation, and he alone advocated it against the papacy and the temporal powers. In his seclusion he had ample opportunity for looking back on the four extraordinary years of the grand struggle, and preparing himself for new enterprises. The principle of the Reformation had found in Luther the organ through which to impart its spirit; but it was now to be ascertained whether he would stand the severe twofold test of resisting the internal enemies who, under the mask of religious and political consistency, sought to direct the movement, and to change reformation into revolution; and whether, after having avoided this danger, he would be able to carry through a comprehensive organisation, either as the foundation of a new church or the renovation of the old one. RESISTANCE TO THE RELIGIOUS REVOLUTION. The reform movement on religious ground might have been driven onward to revolution, if the connexion between historical revelation, the historical character of Christ, and ecclesiastical tradition and government, had been utterly sundered. Luther perceived the danger of such a breaking-away from all historical Christianity in the more and more manifest attempts to undermine the authority of the Scripture and of the sacrament. It appeared to him a departure from or a lowering of the meaning of Scripture, when enthusiasts (the people of Zwickau and the Anabaptists), relying upon their "inward call" (inneres Wort), their own individual inspiration, placed themselves above the Scriptures, and so sought to gain the victory for unconditional subjectivity, for individual fre...
